Now, over again we are at the opening ceremony of the Congress. The House of Representatives was in session without interruption. The President, Mr. Lincoln, was in his seat, ready to deliver his address. The last item we have to report is whether or not Mr. Davis has been appointed to the Senate.

The act of Congress was missed. For a time it seemed as if the President intended to address the Senate. The President, however, declined to deliver the address, and the Senate adjourned sine die.

When the speaker was ready to deliver the address, the House was in session.

The act of Congress was read by Mr. Davis, of Missouri, and the President signed the bill.

The President, in the order of business, asked for the consent of the Senate to the adjournment of the House.

The act of Congress was signed by Mr. Davis, of Missouri, and the President signed the bill.
